'When we measure, most of us judge what we are measuring. We try to analyze it. We try to make sense of it. We try to make it mean something that fits our perception of the way the real world functions. There is something called innocent perception. Innocent perception or practicing the patterns of perception means that you notice whatever shows up. Our path of expectation assumes that there is a cause and effect to things: that if we do this, then this will happen, and if we do not, then something else will happen. There is no logic to it. But it is a logic we have embraced.

Your experience of reality, however you define it, is what you are able to observe and define. This does not mean that you cannot have an experience outside the confines of your reality. What it does mean is that in order to have an experience, you may have to step into a different way of observing, which is fine. One of the things you are going to learn in this book is how to notice what you notice. I am not referring to your ability to notice what you think you are supposed to observe or think.' taken from The Physics of Miracles by Richard Bartlett DC, ND.

By noticing what you notice you can begin to experience new things even in routine situations. Go with what gets your attention; it could be the carpet, the walls, lights, a piece of clothing, shoes, etc. You may find yourself laughing for no reason, go with it. You may have laugh in your mind, but allow yourself the space to do so. As you are doing this your routine situation will begin to appear different because you are different, and you are interacting with the situation on a different level.

If you would like to experience new ways of looking at things with other people doing the same; come join us at our weekly Matrix Energetics group sessions on Monday nights at 7pm in my office.
